

Dear FCC,

For years now, we've had rules regarding invasive listening to private conversations transmitted via electronic means. By this I refer to the law enforcement rules specific to telephone wiretapping.

Have these rules failed us? I think not. I think that these rules were created with great foresight and consideration of the needs of law enforcement and the needs of the citizenry for privacy.

Now that we are on the verge of technological innovation which is changing the means of this private communication, does it change the needs of law enforcement or the citizenry? I think not.

I think that just because the means for the private communication are changing, the needs and rules of tapping into these private conversations has not.

Consider this comment for your review as a vote and support of the existing rules and regulations to be extended to cover the new means for private electronic based communications.
